

UFO'S, UNEXPLAINED PHENOMENA # WORLD GRID PATTERNS

PART 2 BY TONY DREW

In the last edition of Nexus, we explored the concept of the Unified Vector Geometry Grid. A mathematic and geological grid which links sensitive nodal points around the globe. Sensitive places where unexplained phenomena have been occurring since time immemorial. Phenomena, often associated with UFO activity, magic and tribal rituals.

In this edition, we will explore exactly what happens at the nodal points on the UVG grid, how the grid interacts with the geographical map of Australia, and draw conclusions as to just what the nodal points may be.

The map in diagram 1 illustrates how the UVG grid interacts with Australia.

While the avid UFO and sacred site investigators will be able to locate many familiar sites on this map, I have listed several places of specific interest for those less familiar with the subject.

Alice Springs: Numerous UFO sightings, especially near Pine Gap. Unusual earthlight phenomena reported at aboriginal sacred site - Corroborrie Rock.

Port Headland: Port Headland Military Tracking Station.

Woomera: Important aboriginal sacred site, and area of British atomic bomb testing in the 1950's.

Huskisson: Multi-coloured fireball burst through wall of local hotel 19th March 1978. Traditional territory for aboriginals.

Kempsey: Much UFO activity reported in area.

Winton & Boulia: Sightings of "min-min" lights moving in erratic paths on numerous occasions.

Frazer Island: Area of many UFO sightings. A 100ft. long black USO (Unidentified Submerged Object) sighted off-shore in 1965. Other USOs sighted in area ever since.

Tully: Area of many UFO sightings, including the famous "Saucer Nests", classified by some as part of the crop circle phenomenon.

Nullabor Plain: Area of many UFO sightings, including the much publicised Knowles family case, near Mundrabilla.

Bass Straight: Area of major UFO activity, and area of many missing civilian and military vessels and planes. The official RAAF missing aircraft list includes - 8 Beauforts, 3 Hudsons, 2 Mitchells, 3 Ansons, 2 Oxfords, 2 Wirraways, 1 US B57 and 1 Spitfire. It also includes the area where pilot Frederick Valentich disappeared.

In Great Britain a good deal of work has been done by the likes of Paul Devereaux and The Dragon Project, on scientifically investigating ancient sites. Particularly those sites which have long been associated with unusual phenomena and UFO associated activity.

On the following map (diagram 2) you can see some of the local grid lines that cover England and the sites that have been investigated to date.

Let us now explore one of the sites in detail. (See Diagram 3).

The Rollright Stones. 2 major structures.

1) the King stone, a single 2.5 metre monolith near a 31.6m diameter circle of 76 limestone monoliths called the King's Circle.

2) the Whispering Knights, a cluster of monoliths leaning in on each other, some 400m ESE of the circle.

At certain times and especially at full moons, humming and ticking sounds have been heard coming from the whispering knights and to a lesser extent, the King's Circle. Strange ultra-sound readings have also been recorded, especially at dawn, and one set actually produced a perfect square wave when put through an oscilloscope.

Earthlights, pillars of light, and light mists have been seen emanating from the ground around the stones since time immemorial. Electric shocks have been received from the stones and infra-red photography has shown unusual light emanating from certain stones.

The Magnetic field inside the circle is significantly lower inside the circle than it is outside and actually forms a 3-dimensional field of spiralling intensity. Very high natural radiation levels are found on the road just outside the circle and "Mind Mirror" EEG machine readings taken of subjects inside the circle indicate that their bi-cameral brainwave patterns display theta and delta wave patterns, the patterns normally associated with deep hypnosis and sleep.

(Note: While this is just one example, the same types of phenomena take place at sacred sites around the world. For more information, read Places of Power - Secret Energies at Ancient Sites, by Paul Devereux. Published by Blandford 1990.)

What does this situation prove? It may not prove anything, but as the unusual phenomena found at nodes on the grid system were occurring at the time of our forefathers, it certainly alludes to the point that they were quite aware of the phenomena and subsequently built structures around them which marked, focussed or enhanced their "power".

In summing up, the locations that are on grid lines and nodal hotspots, let us re-cap on the phenomena that take place in all of these areas to varying extents.

Radio and Radar interference, magnetic fluctuations, unusual ultrasonic activity, interruption to electrical power. Power surges, electric shock, draining of batteries. High radiation levels, strange smells, nausea, feelings of illness, time distortion, fairy-lights or earthlights, ball lightning, other strange visible aerial phenomena and unusual green, yellow or white mists in apparently good weather.

Geophysically, the most likely causes of these phenomena are abnormal interference in local geomagnetic fields, high natural radiation and electromagnetic disturbances caused by tectonic activity and ley lines.

Such interference will affect all types of electrical equipment, will influence compasses, interfere with radio equipment, set up an electric current or field and may if strong enough, create unusual light effects, mists and odours.

They may also create time distortion because:

- 1) they interfere with the brains electrochemical nature
- 2) as time is an integral factor in an electromagnetic field, anyone in the altered field of experience will experience the time factor set up by the field itself.

When Rollright was being investigated by the Dragon Project, there were at least 3 cases of severe time distortion.

Case 1: A researcher went to their car to get something from the boot. (Note: at Rollright, the area of radiation intensity was under the road, not in the circle). As he opened the boot he noticed a car approaching at about 900meters. The next thing he knew, the car had disappeared. It had either approached, passed him and faded into the distance in what to him was the blinking of an eye, (mental blank); was an hallucination; was observed in a time shift (ie from the past or future) or the car actually vanished.

Case 2: Two researchers were sitting in a van having lunch and both of them noticed the back of a black, short haired dog move passed the window. Thinking it odd, both got out of the van to investigate immediately but found no trace of the dog. What is interesting in this case is that for them to have seen the back of the dog, it must have been at least 1.3m at the shoulder. It is unlikely that 2 people will have the same hallucination at the same time, 1.3m high dogs are few and far between, their activity at the time makes a joint mental blank unlikely, so did they observe at time shift?

Case 3: A female researcher was strolling along the road, glanced at the surface and watched it form into concentric circles about 15cm in diameter. At the same time she felt a vibrating, especially in her head and felt a highly charged atmosphere around her. Suddenly she became aware that the event was not normal, so she looked up. She then saw an old fashioned green horse-drawn Gypsy caravan being driven away from her up the road. She then glanced away, looked back and it was gone. Possible hallucination, definitely not mental blank, caravans don't vanish and no one else on the site saw it come or go, so again, it may have been a time shift.

It is also worth noting that all the incident happened on the same stretch of road and that infra-red photography of the area has shown a strange "cloud" hovering over it.

From these three cases, the issue of time distortion can be seen, but there is also a new dilemma to deal with, if these people did experience an actual time shift, was it purely mental or was it physical as well?

Apart from these three specific cases at Rollright, what do people generally experience in areas of this nature:

Rollright is on top of the last ridge of the Cotswolds, twenty miles north-west of Oxford, on a side road between the A34 and A44 some three miles north of Chipping Norton. The road forms part of the Oxfordshire/Warwickshire border there. The circle (known as the King's Men) is a true circle of about 100 feet in diameter, containing about 73 stones - in places it's a bit difficult to decide which bits of rock are only fragments of local stone. Most are about three feet high, with the largest just under eight feet; all are badly weather-worn. Three hundred feet away, on the north side of the road and in the next county, is the King Stone, a single stone about eight feet high, and a ruined dolmen (the Whispering Knights), a quarter of a mile to the east, completes the group. They are presumed to be Neolithic - around 2000 BC - but the site hasn't been excavated to check.

I owe many thanks to the owner, Pauline Flick, and to various of her friends and relations, for the help they gave me in my surveys there.

1 Rollright: geographical layout

Depending on where you sit in history and the state of the collective unconscious, they experience angels, fairy-folk, spirits, animal totems, UFOs or aliens. They may have feast with fairy queens or be medically examined by clinical humanoids. But whatever the case, they do enter a different dimension or reality and either visually, mentally or physically interact with others who are not of our normal reality.

They enter what we might call a transdimensional gateway and return with experiences that can be unusual and unsettling to say the least.

Moving back to more clinical grounds, it is interesting to note that psychological tests have shown that the temporal lobe area of the brain is sensitive to electromagnetism and that parts of it, such as the hippocampus, are related to dreaming and memory. Magnetic fields can stimulate these parts of the brain and in doing so, seem able to produce in the subject, sensations of floating, vivid hallucinations in waking consciousness, mystical and visionary states and even statistical evidence that links geomagnetism with some types of psychic activity.

Does this mean that what people experience in these areas, apart from the measurable and observable physical phenomena that we have already discussed is all in the mind or perhaps even some type of mystical experience?

Possibly, but at our most fundamental level, the sub-atomic, we are actually composed of packets of quanta of energy, operating within a certain time frame and resonating as material particles within a specific field of action.

Theoretically, any change to the nature of that field (such as that caused by abnormal electromagnetic interference), could in turn, create a change in the physical reality of any participant in that field.

If the change in field was strong enough, what may happen, is that from the sub-atomic level up, the individual would be forced to totally conform to the new field, in which case they would cease to exist in this one (and if this theory is correct, it may explain the unsolved cases of planes, ships and people who vanish in places like the Bermuda Triangle). Or they may become aware of and experience the reality of, the other field for a time.

Such as the documented case of an English woman who lives on top of a granite hill in South America. Not only is there sporadic earthlight activity outside her house, but the woman reports curious time shifts and the momentary appearance and disappearance of objects and entities inside her home.

It is just possible that such a set of circumstances would create physical rather than mental gateways to other dimensions, or perhaps worm holes through the space-time continuum. If such things existed, they would allow the constraints of time. Conversely, this would also allow inhabitants of other dimensions of reality to enter ours.

How much of the UFO phenomena is physical, psychological, natural and mystical, we really don't know, but hopefully an open minded approach to research in the future will help us to find out.
